

D.B.]; and a generally more militant insistence that ghetto conditions be improved now, an insistence which makes its point partially by being willing to step across the line of non-violence into violence (p. 195). This is patently dysfunctional, for such a combination of truths and falsehoods can only distort.

Racial Policies and Practices of Real Estate Brokers.

By ROSE HELPER (Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, and London, Oxford University Press, 1970). xiv + 387 pp. 90s.

Apartheid American Style.

By JOHN H. DENTON (Berkeley, Diablo Press, 1967). 164 pp. $1.95.

In reading American books on race relations, British students of the subject must constantly be looking for parallels and differences with the British situation. More often than not however one is faced with comparing a well-documented situation in America with a series of hunches and guesses about race relations in Britain.

Rose Helper's book Racial Policies and Practices of Real Estate Brokers explores a field that has been touched on only in the most rudimentary way in Britain. It makes fascinating reading. Starting with the intention of getting away from the 'villains and heroes' approach, she has tried to relate the racial ideas and actions of real estate brokers to their ideas about the work they do, the ideology of their profession, particularly as expressed by N.A.R.E.B. (the National Association of Real Estate Brokers) and to the pressures that they see being put upon them by mortgage lenders and, most importantly, by the public.

The most significant aspect of the book is the insight it gives into the extraordinary way in which racial attitudes have become entrenched into the American social and institutional systems. However much one knows about this, it is still striking to hear the opinions so clearly stated and to follow the inexorable process of their expression through the housing market.

There are two criticisms of the book: it does seem a little unnecessarily repetitive in the earlier chapters, and perhaps Dr. Helper has been at too great pains to step back from judgement of the brokers. There are two results of this last point. Firstly, for those who are not familiar with the field, she does not put the brokers' view into perspective by presenting the contrary ones. This is particularly striking in the discussion of price trends in racially changing areas. For instance, only the most passing reference is made to Laurenti's work. One suspects that this is partly the result of the bulk of the book having been written 10 years ago. Secondly, having tried to understand the ideas and actions of the brokers, she has perhaps become overimpressed with the view that they are the tools of the public. She fails to pinpoint the ways in which their behaviour itself affects the market—the self-fulfilling prophecy aspect of the situation.

One of Dr. Helper's conclusions is:

that not the broker but the property owner or tenant—that is, the white American citizen and his conception of Negroes—is the basic problem in housing discrimination. . . . It has been said that the real estate board and real estate men exercise great influence over property owners, and several studies have attested to the strength of this influence, but according to the data of the present study, neither the Board nor the 'legitimate' real estate broker urges white people to move when Negroes enter their area. The panic peddlers, the block-busters, frighten them into moving, whereas most
