Richards, 1909 Florence Nightingale the Angel of the Crimea A Story for Young People Step by step and all unconsciously Florence Nightingale had been training her hand and eye to follow the dictates of her keen mind and loving heart Now grown a young woman she began to think seriously how she should apply this training What should she do with her life Should she go on like her friends in the quiet pleasant ways of country life The squire's daughter was busy enough surely Every hour of the day was full of useful kindly work of happy healthy play should she be content with this Her heart told her that she was not content In her friendly visiting among the sick poor she had seen much misery and suffering far more than she and all the other kindly ladies could attempt to relieve She felt that something more was needed she began to look around to see what was being done in the larger world It was about this time that she met Elizabeth Fry the noble and beautiful friend of the prisoner Mrs Fry was then an elderly woman with all the glory of her saintly life shining about her Florence Nightingale an earnest and thoughtful girl of perhaps eighteen or twenty It is pleasant to think of that meeting I do not know what words passed between them but I can almost see them together the beautiful stately woman in her Quaker dress the slender girl with her quiet face and earnest eyes can almost hear the young voice questioning eager and ardent the elder answering grave and sedate words full of weight and wisdom of sweetness and tenderness This interview was one of the great moments of Florence Nightingale's early life Youth's Companion, 1882
