A grounded theory design was used to capture the complexities of the participants combat and post combat experiences. Fifteen men volunteered to participate in up to four interviews. Data analysis revealed six categories which were broken down into the five findings: numbness, results in withdrawal from relationships and social engagement, experiencing death, witnessing death or injuries of people close to them, and realizing that they could get killed at any time. Idealization of command is promoted but is invariably ruptured. Survival guilt is bad news and physically broken, mentally broken, and emotionally broken. Also addressed was the distinctive process that unfolded as the participants engaged the researcher around the exploration of being broken. Theoretical research and clinical implications are discussed.
