

Schizophrenia and Family Studies

MARY V. SEEMAN, M.D.*

This review presumes genetic variants and non-genetic phenocopies of clinical schizophrenia. The evidence for genetic transmission of some of the schizophrenias is reviewed. Non-genetic family contributions are difficult to specify and the methodology for studying them has not been perfected. Definitive results of longitudinal studies are still awaited but it seems likely that operationalized cognitive and affective styles of parents correlate with some schizophrenias in offspring. Direction of effects will need to be determined. Certain affective styles (hostility, intrusiveness) on the part of relatives correlates with relapse rates in schizophrenia. These habitual styles are alterable by educative and supportive family counseling. Family burden is being increasingly recognized and therapeutic efforts are being expanded to include the extended families of schizophrenics.

GENETIC STUDIES

Knowledge of the patterns of inheritance of schizophrenic disorders is essential to the understanding of the contribution of non-genetic family factors. An excellent, up-to-date overview is available by two of the foremost researchers in the field of schizophrenia genetics, Irving Gottesman and the late James Shields.¹ A summary of their conclusions follows:

1. Schizophrenia, defined by relatively conservative, i.e., narrow, diagnostic standards, carries a lifetime risk in most societies of approximately 1%. The ubiquitous 1% figure argues against culture-bound family rearing patterns as important etiological factors.

2. The risk of schizophrenia in the relatives of index cases increases with genetic relatedness. There is a 50% (approximately) risk for identical twins and for offspring of two schizophrenics; a 10% risk for children of one schizophrenic, for siblings and for non-identical twins; a 3% risk for half-siblings, for nephews, nieces, aunts, uncles, and grandchildren of a schizophrenic. This is unchanged in the absence of shared growing-up environments. These facts argue against the primacy of family environmental factors but are not compatible with straightforward Mendelian genetics.

3. The risk to relatives rises if many relatives are affected and also rises if the illness in the index case is severe. This favors polygenic inheritance.

4. Children of schizophrenic fathers are as much at risk as children of schizophrenic mothers. This argues against the significance of intrauterine factors.

5. Same-sex non-identical twins are no more concordant for schizophrenia than opposite-sex non-identical twins. This argues against psychological identification as an important etiological factor.

6. Although the sex ratio for schizophrenia is equal by the end of the risk period, the onset age for males is approximately six years earlier than for females. This argues for the possibility of protective or delaying factors in women or, alternatively, precipitating factors in men. A fruitful field of family research would be the elucidation of gender-specific family factors.

7. Since approximately 50% of identical twins are discordant for schizophrenia, non-genetic factors must play an important role in the expression of the disease. The children of a set of identical twins who are discordant for schizophrenia have the same chance of becoming schizophrenic whether they are the children of the schizophrenic twin or the healthy twin. This is more suggestive of the healthy twin's schizophrenic genotype being "non-expressed" than of the twins' multipotential genotype being "directed toward schizophrenia" (in the schizophrenic twin only) by environmental factors. In other words, it seems likely that environmental factors, including family factors, are protecting (against the inevitability of schizophrenia) rather than provoking (of schizophrenia). Family studies have traditionally looked for noxious or provoking factors rather than protective factors.

8. Children of nonschizophrenic parents, adopted by parents one of whom later becomes schizophrenic, do not show an increased rate of schizophrenia. (Thus far, approximately twenty such children have been followed into adulthood). This again suggests that a parent cannot induce schizophrenia in
