

CURRICULUM AND DECENTRALIZATION

The New York City Public School System

STEVEN J. FREDERICKS
Bank Street College of Education

In many large urban centers, students, parents, communities, teachers, and local school boards have had little to say about the educational policies (both administrative and curricular) that affect them. Because of the culturally, ethnically, and racially diverse make-up of urban populations, various groups have demanded more participatory control of their schools in order to satisfy their distinctive needs; and these same people, questioning their relationship with the educational structure, have found, more often than not, that their impotence to state, direct, and achieve educational objectives is very much related to ongoing intrabureaucratic struggles. In this regard, probably no city can match New York City in size and potential as an illustration of bureaucratic growth. Its mushrooming bureaucracy and concomitant pressures reached such proportions that, in November of 1969, decentralization of the New York City public school system was legislated from Albany.

Decentralization and community control have been historically perceived as two distinct notions, the former involving
