

Jill Cremer

My shell piece. As it always begins with the idea of a walking shell, I then researched the colors to make sure of the spirit. From Lani where I walk often on the Laguna coast in California, I reached the "panda" of the shell from there filled in the gaps with purple, white. The hole was from the same area. The two sides were reached together from the edge which left a shallow groove on each side. I filled this with braided fringe and then added embellishments.

Clashwater (Shanku) is a braided hair weaving using blonde 1 x 100 Denier. It represents women dressed in braided heads in every-day colors. Clashwater (Shanku) represents a Native American woman named after the Clashwater Canyon located off the west coast of the Americas.

The texture of the hair is often most spiritual with pleatherwood hair. The "oil" on her face and the black curve from her head into the side of the face is a reference to the single strands of the Clashwater Indians. Look closely and you can see the eye and back of the hair single strands. The shape of her girth and earrings are traditional, another Native American Indian tribe from the Pacific Northwest.

The eyes are closed in typical fashion. View her closely and you will see a woman in a meditative pose with her eyes closed. This piece honors spiritualism, the unknown, the future, and beauty of the sea and peace.

Black and back at her again and you will see a woman with a wild and unruly hair of braiding progression. The pressing blue eye will pull you into the braided journey with its eye in design. This woman symbolizes the temperance nature of the sea and the beautiful women looking in the deep.
