

Striga is a parasitic weed and one of the most important challenges in millet production, especially in the drier and less fertile soils of the Sahel and northern Sudan Savannah. The weed is single stemmed with bright red flowers. Most of the damage is done before the parasite emerges from the soil. Farmers are known to sometimes abandon their field if Striga incidence is excessive (Figure 5). The symptoms include leaf withering, leaf rolling, and leaf scorching even though the soil may have sufficient water. The tiny seeds are disseminated by wind, water, and animals, and remain viable in the soil for 15-20 years. Rotation with cotton, groundnut, cowpea and pigeon pea reduces the incidence of Striga in sorghum fields. Hand pulling of plants before flowering may help.

3.7. Pests and Diseases Control

Damage due to pests such as stem borers can be severe in some seasons. While other pests that attack the crop include head miners (Figure 6), midges, bristly beetle and bugs. Early planting can prevent attacks. Spraying with Cypermethrin and Lambda-Cyhalothrin (karate) can remedy pest attacks. Also, most import disease is the Downy mildew (Figure 7). Destroying cereal crop residues by burning or composting can reduce pest build-up. Birds can severely damage pearl millet; so, bird scaring can serve as a deterrent.
