

Closer look at Bog Brook

Bog Brook, a longtime favorite fishing and cooling spot in Androscoggin and Oxford Counties, is the center of a developing effort to implement shoreland zoning to prevent development along its winding shores.

MINOT — When Randy Dustin, who has lived in the Minot-Mechanic Falls area for 10 years, and Tim Doughty, whose family owns land in Mechanic Falls, talk about Bog Brook, they wax sentimental about its pristine fishing holes, beavers, muskrats and other wildlife.

As fishermen, they praise the stream as one of the few self-sustaining cold-water fisheries in Maine; as residents, they have enjoyed seeing children use its swimming holes and adults scan the bog for deer, duck and muskrat.

But as citizens, they are among an increasing number in the state concerned about development along smaller streams and wetlands.

In two recent sessions, the Legislature passed amendments to the Shoreland Zoning Act, according to Dan Pritchard, assistant shoreland zoning coordinator for the Department of Environmental Protection.

But the new provisions — intended to protect wetlands 10 acres or larger and all brooks from the point at which two year-road streams converge — won't go into effect until December 1981, and that leaves citizens worried developers will rush to take advantage of waterfront property.

The DEP mailed copies of new ordinance guidelines to planning boards around the state approximately two weeks ago, Pritchard said. The agency hopes town boards will consider developing local ordinances to be adopted at town meetings this year, before the state forces its own rules on them next year.

"It's a very busy time in shoreland zoning," said Tim Wright of the DEP's Site Location Review. "Every planning board in the state wants advice."

Minot is one of the few towns in the state forced to accept state shoreland zoning in 1974 after it failed to adopt its own local ordinance, Pritchard said. The Planning Board could consider the amendments and put an ordinance before voters, according to Vice Chairman John Gossman, but in the past Minot has accepted the state requirements.

To Dustin and Doughty — aware of a campground built in Hebron, timber harvested at Hebron's Beaver Hole, gravel mined at Mitchell's Lodge, logging and soil mining on The Flats in Minot in the last four years, and a newly proposed house site in West Minot — acceptance is not good enough.

The two distributed fliers last week in an effort to organize Citizens for the Preservation of Bog Brook and have had more than a dozen people respond. The effort to save the brook — which starts in Buckfield and runs through Hebron, Minot and Mechanic Falls to the Little Androscoggin River — drew interest from many regional residents, particularly anglers, they said.

"We need to codify the ordinance, get legal help and a citizens pact," said Dustin, who writes a fishing column for Sunday. "Bog Brook is a real jewel of a resource and someone has to do something before it's chopped up."

"I think you have a pattern of not looking at the watershed here in the past," Doughty said, adding, "I see a need to adopt these guidelines."

The catalyst for the citizens movement has been an effort by Chuck Starbird of Minot to build on Route 124 in West Minot. The lot, smaller than the town's minimum building lot size and close to the brook, borders a favorite swimming and fishing hole.

Starbird — who has an agreement to purchase the lot from Eileen and Alan Davis of Gray if he can prove it fit to build on, Davis said — has not been able to get the town's plumbing inspector, Joseph D'Amour, to sign a septic system permit.

D'Amour said the lot survey, apparently hand-drawn by Starbird, is not sufficiently accurate. He also wants a hydraulics engineer to determine where the high-water mark is but "the septic system spoil the brook."

Under flood plain provisions, a building must be located 100 feet from the high-water mark and 10 feet from the center of the highway, D'Amour said. Selectmen told D'Amour last week the lot could be within 2 feet of conforming, he noted.

While Starbird has argued that the lot, which contains a deteriorating schoolhouse, is grandfathered, Dustin said, Dustin contends that because the schoolhouse had no plumbing system, Starbird should not be permitted to install one. Much of the lot is frequently under a foot of water, he added. Starbird was not available for comment Thursday.

Exceptions to state plumbing code may be made, however, when a septic system is being upgraded, Wright noted, and a move from an on-lotline to a septic system could be considered an upgrade. The 100-foot minimum distance can be waived if a spot within a lot is considered the safest for a septic system, he said.

The new shoreland zoning provisions could allow the towns along the brook to regulate building within 100 feet of the high-water mark, Pritchard said. The brook is protected by current shoreland zoning from its confluence with Gardner Brook just above Mechanic Falls, he noted, but even there the 100-foot limit would be new.
