Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the self-reported health status of men and women who had been sexually abused as children compared to those who had not. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health (NLSA-H) were used. Results showed that men and women who had been sexually abused as children reported significantly higher rates of physical, mental, and social problems than those who had not. These findings suggest that childhood sexual abuse has long-term effects on adult health status.
