Military Planning in the Twentieth Century Harry Borowski, Lt Harry R Borowski, United States Academy, 2012-05-26 The essays commentaries and speeches which form this volume were presented at the Eleventh Military History Symposium at the United States Air Force Academy Few events traumatize a nation more than losing a war Defeat can bring down an empire alter national boundaries end sovereignty and dramatically change a society's social structure Failures are explained in many ways and are seldom of a singular nature Their roots however can be traced to the planning for war For this reason no other peacetime activity should command more attention from military leaders and scholars than the study of military planning In reality commanders prefer to concentrate on more immediate and understandable concerns supplying training and fighting Military historians also prefer to study combat and the battlefield where the results of all efforts are starkly evident Consequently the Department of History decided to dedicate its Eleventh Military History Symposium to the too seldom studied topic of military planning the foundation for successful warfare Office of Air Force History United States Air Force is natural therefore for them to address the topic jointly in a professional meeting The best way to accomplish these aims however is not clear because the problems inherent in military planning are many and involved This volume features one approach taken by those participating in the 1984 Eleventh Military History Symposium and makes no pretension to exhaustive treatment It does however strive to provide key insights into recent military planning experiences that will be of value to planners If it serves to stimulate and inform those entrusted with the difficult burden of planning it will have succeeded in the real sense
