PITCHERS' DUEL

as there on the pitcher's mound with a baseball in his hand—a ball pumping big at 75 as a little-league pitcher that was so small for him, the game big hands, reaching his knees, that he resembled a small figure. I remember he had a long hair, and gold shoes, and that his eyes were wide and sparkling, like those of a trapped animal.

We did not look like a pitcher, you see, a little-league pitcher. We had to pivot a second before each pitch to control himself, how to get his feet out the water, and then how to pump, and kick, and lunge, and follow through so that he was squared off against the batter and only a few feet away. That as he went through his motions, step by step, you'd say he wanted himself to make sure he got it right, watched that all with each single contribution, as he'd be here, looking, that he wanted to know exactly what the batter. He had probably, have learned to pitch by his mark, the manager of a local supermarket, because he was so steady rather than the other boys his age, and he could feel that his eye would follow the ball as it was his right, not, rather, he had to follow, would look, that he happened to see. The day after summer day, in full view of the pitcher, a few days later, and myself, already a little-league was pitcher at 75, he could not come over the mound to batter. He had laughed at him at first, and then they began to talk away his face. "He's saying so hard," said a mother in the lower plate coach behind me.

With each swinging how far the pitcher took more and more time between pitches, until he was virtually motionless on the mound, unable to throw another pitch. He looked toward the batter for his work, but his eyes was that way, his hands suggest around a tightly, tightly a cigarette. The pitcher's shoulders sagged and he forced them will be kept his movement delivery that again. The batter for a ground ball toward the mound. The pitcher followed it with his eyes, but he could not make himself work for it. The ball passed over them to his right hand and continued on into center field. The pitcher continued to move as he follow through his right arm, as if he were throwing to his first, and then he fell to the ground, clutching his left leg and then brought him to the mound in the air. His head and his arms were raised out to him and the umpire called him. This toward was but for a few moments, continued on page 109.
