Redesigning Education Edward Wheeler, 1973
Redesigning Schools Joseph P. McDonald, 1996-11-22 For five years McDonald charted the progress of ten schools in the Coalition of Essential Schools as they immersed themselves in the hard work of school reform He also visited many other schools both elementary and secondary in an attempt to understand serious school reform and its prospects He concludes that school reform requires redesign in three critical areas The first is a shift in the ordinary and often tacit beliefs of the people who work in schools the communities that support them and even the children who attend them The second area which McDonald dubs the wiring arena involves internal communication and power arrangements The third area called tuning involves connecting the school to the needs interests and values of the communities it serves Education Reform
