Excerpt from The Portable Engine Its Construction and Management A Practical Manual for Owners and Uses of Steam Engines Generally This engine it seems was furnished with a blast pipe but whether or not this was made use of to cause an artificial draught does not appear At any rate it is described as puffing so loudly that it could be heard for miles In the account of another of Trevithick's engines about the same period however it is explicitly stated that the steam puffed up the chimney These were not it will be understood actually movable engines upon wheels but they were undoubtedly a considerable advance in the direction of portability upon the engines of Watt Hornblower and others which were in most cases dependent upon the masonry and walls of the engine house for the connection between the beam and the cylinder Trevithick's engines above referred to were more over direct acting so that we have at this early date about 1803 the essentials of a portable engine high pressure direct action and forced draught The boiler appears to have been of cast iron cylindrical with a single wrought iron tube passing through it and to have been quite independent of brickwork foundations and setting and the engine was attached to the boiler The pressure would seem to have been about 30 lbs Above the atmosphere The next step in the history of the portable engine is represented by a machine designed by Messrs Tuxford of Boston in 1839 the year of the establishment of the Royal Agricultural Society About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books Find more at www.forgottenbooks.com This book is a reproduction of an important historical work Forgotten Books uses state of the art technology to digitally reconstruct the work preserving the original format whilst repairing imperfections present in the aged copy In rare cases an imperfection in the original such as a blemish or missing page may be replicated in our edition We do however repair the vast majority of imperfections successfully any imperfections that remain are intentionally left to preserve the state of such historical works
