

Mapped Montreal

Urban Mapping, Multimedia

The following piece is a regional map of Montreal using textures from the piano. This piece shows how society has adapted to live in certain areas of a city and how the infrastructure has evolved to accommodate these demands. The wood textures were used to describe the suburbs of the city, while the metal textures mapped out areas of industrial infrastructure. Downtown was mapped using a golden texture, as it is typically seen as the hub of any city.

These textured regions were then layed out to show the individual regions of the city. As seen in the chart, the city of Montreal is approximately 60% residential suburbs and the remaining 30% is industrial/commercial infrastructure.

a. In early centuries, cities were densely populated due to the limitations of transportation.

b. As engineering developed, cities were able to expand - at first using the bones of city street grids or rivers.

c. Urban layouts also grew as transportation developed. With the production of cars and roads, cities were no longer in city boundaries.

d. Many regions where a city were developed using infrastructure from each other and creating larger neighbourhoods within the system.
