Principles of Home Decoration Jean Dunbar, 2001

Long before there was Martha Stewart, there was Candace Wheeler. Published originally in 1903, this book was the culmination of a long career as one of America's most listened-to home decorating advisors. In it, Wheeler wrote: "There is no influence so potent in life as harmonious surroundings and to create and possess a home which is harmonious in a simple and inexpensive way is the privilege of all but the wretchedly poor." Principles of Home Decoration became a standard text for home decorating.

CHAPTER I
DECORATION AS AN ART

Who creates a Home creates a potent spirit which in turn doth fashion him that fashioned. Probably no art has so few masters as that of decoration. In England Morris was for many years the great leader but among his followers in England no one has attained the dignity of unquestioned authority and in America in spite of far more general practice of the art we still are without a leader whose very name establishes law. It is true we are free to draw inspiration from the same sources which supplied Morris and the men associated with him in his enthusiasms and in fact we do lean as they did upon English eighteenth century domestic art and derive from the men who made that period famous many of our articles of faith but there are almost no authoritative books upon the subject of appropriate modern decoration. Our text books are still to be written and one must glean knowledge from many sources, shape it into rules and test the rules before adopting them as safe guides. Yet in spite of the absence of authoritative teaching we have learned that an art dependent upon other arts as decoration is upon building and architecture is bound to follow the principles which govern them. We must base our work upon what has already been done, select our decorative forms from appropriate periods, conform our use of colour to the principles of colour and be able to choose and apply all manufactures in accordance with the great law of appropriateness. If we do this we stand upon something capable of evolution and the creation of a system. In so far as the principles of decoration are derived from other arts they can be acquired by every one but an exquisite feeling in their application is the distinguishing quality of the true decorator. There is quite a general impression that house decoration is not an art which requires a long course of study and training but some kind of natural knack of arrangement, a faculty of making things look pretty and that any one who has this faculty is amply qualified for taking up house decoration. Indeed, nature succeeds in satisfying many personal cravings for beauty although it is not competent for general practice. Of course there are people and many of them who are gifted with an inherent sense of balance and arrangement and a true eye for colour and given the same materials such people will make a room pleasant and cozy where one without these gifts would make it positively ugly In so far then individual gifts are a great advantage yet one possessing them in even an unusual degree may make great mistakes in decoration What not to do in this day of almost universal experiment is perhaps the most valuable lesson to the untrained decorator Many of the rocks upon which he splits are down in no chart and lie in the track of what seems to him perfectly plain sailing There are houses of fine and noble exterior which are vulgarized by uneducated experiments in colour and ornament and belittled by being filled with heterogeneous collections of unimportant art
