

The preparation for human travel into space is called:

BIOASTRONAUTICS

Read here about some of the things that happen to the human body in space.

400 km height
15 km/sec

The International Space Station orbits Earth. Here - among other things - research is done on the effect of space on the body.

In space, cosmic radiation is abundant. Radiation harms our DNA, it can lead to mutations and, in the long run, potentially cause cancer.

In a state of weightlessness, our muscles don't have to work as hard as usual to carry the weight of the body. And so, the strength and mass of muscles decline rapidly.

During trips in space, astronauts become taller. This may be because the muscles in the back that keep the spine S-shaped, wither. This can lead to herniated discs and chronic pain.

On a space mission, astronauts are cramped with only a few others in a very tight space.

Researchers are looking into the social and psychological effects of such isolation. For example, at isolated facilities in the Antarctic.

Without the pull of gravity, our bones deteriorate, as they do in some conditions like osteoporosis.

In a weightless state, fluids such as blood and water are not pulled downwards. This causes the upper body and the brain of astronauts in space to swell up.

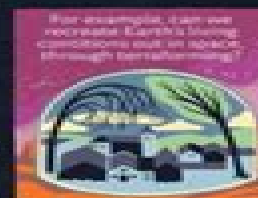

The heart is weakened, so it doesn't have to work as hard to pump blood into the body's extremities. It becomes more spherical.

The altered cycles of light and darkness in space affect our circadian rhythm.

Pressure on the optic nerve from increased fluids can cause visual disturbances and damage to the retina.
