

in the hospital ; I did not learn when the poor fellow died ; that leaves only Webb, Gallagher and myself out of my company who are alive.

4th. Great excitement here this morning owing to some of the prisoners tunneling out under the stockade last night ; it appears they had been working at it for over two weeks. Wirz came in and examined the tunnel this morning ; he said the bloodhounds would soon catch them.

5th. Wirz came in this morning with twenty guards ; he said he heard there were two or three more tunnels ; but after a diligent search he could not find any signs of them ; The Yankees will fool him again, as he passed over two that I know of.

6th. It is terribly hot ; Wirz was in again this morning with his bodyguard ; he is afraid to come in alone, as there are many who will kill him upon the first opportunity.

The stern arm of vengeance against them we'll raise,
And around them the flames of our bitterness blaze,
For we swore they should pay for the deeds they have done ;

And we ne'er will relent—not a tyrant we'll spare,
But hang them on gibbets to rot in the air,
Till those that survive them confess that they feel,
That our army's resistless, and our hearts are of steel.

I learned this morning that one of my regiment got away with those who tunneled out. I witnessed an amputation this afternoon ; a prisoner got a sore on his foot and it was decided to amputate it. He did not want to go to the hospital as his brother is here to take care of him, and that accounts for the amputation being performed in the stockade.

We point with pride to the thousands of graves and say, these comrades chose the most cruel death rather than dishonor their country in any way by assisting the enemy to destroy it by taking the oath of allegiance, which they often tried to induce us to do.
