

The Race Relations Act of 1965 marked a significant legislative shift in the United Kingdom, introducing the first laws against racial discrimination. Before the Act was passed, the UK had a long history of racial tension, heightened by a wave of immigrants from Commonwealth countries in the decades following World War II.

In the post-war period, the British economy needed labour to rebuild and thus encouraged immigration from the Commonwealth nations. However, these immigrants were often met with prejudice, intolerance, and hostility, leading to racial tensions and conflict. Signs saying "No Blacks, No Dogs, No Irish" were common sights in the windows of rented accommodations, symbolising the blatant racial discrimination prevalent during the time.

Prejudice and discrimination were deeply ingrained in society, permeating various sectors such as housing, employment, and social services. In 1958, tensions escalated into violence during the Notting Hill race riots, starkly underscoring the need for governmental intervention.

These riots were initiated by 'white' youth gangs who targeted the homes of West Indian residents, causing fear and unrest in the multicultural neighbourhood. Over the course of six days, the violence escalated, culminating in hundreds of 'white' rioters attacking the Caribbean community.
