

Matching parenting to child

What role do child temperament and parenting style play in the development of later behavioural and emotional problems? Recent findings from the Social Development Project suggest that both factors are important influences on child adjustment, and that the "best" style of parenting may differ for children with different temperaments.

SHERYL HEMPHILL AND ANN SANSON

Childhood behavioural problems have been defined in many different ways, but in the context of this article, they refer to "acting-out" behaviours such as aggressive behaviour and noncompliance. The prevalence of children's behavioural problems is concerningly high, with rates of about 15-20 per cent being recorded (Prior et al. 2000; Zubrick et al. 2000). Rates of problems seem to vary by gender, particularly in middle childhood to adolescence, with boys exhibiting more behavioural problems than girls. Once entrenched, behavioural problems are likely to continue through childhood and adolescence and into adulthood. For example, aggressive behaviour in childhood is associated with adolescent delinquency and criminality (Loeber et al. 1991; Prior et al. 2000).

Behavioural problems have been notoriously difficult to treat and there is an increasing emphasis on prevention (that is, intervening before problems are detected) and early intervention (that is, intervening at early signs of difficulties) to avoid the development and entrenchment of such problems.

In order to identify children at risk of difficulties, and to intervene effectively, an understanding of the factors influencing the development of children's behavioural problems is vital. Two of the main factors implicated in the development of behavioural problems are child temperament and parenting. Most research has investigated the influence of child temperament and parenting separately but there is increasing evidence that the interaction between the two may be particularly important. In the section that follows, these key constructs are defined and their role in children's development outlined.

INFLUENCES ON EA

Child temperament

Child temperament refers to constitutionally-based individual differences in behavioural style that are visible from early childhood (Rothbart and Bates 1998). Three broad aspects of temperament are gaining wide acceptance. Negative reactivity refers to high-intensity negative reactions such as irritability, whining and whingeing. Approach/inhibition describes the tendency of a child to approach novel situations and people, or conversely to withdraw and be wary. Persistence refers to the ability to stick at one task for some time and sustain organised play.

The aspects of child temperament that seem to be risk factors for the development of childhood behavioural problems are high negative reactivity and low persistence (Azar 1995; Prior et al 2000; Rothbart and Bates 1998). Inhibition (a tendency to withdraw from novelty) may reduce the likelihood of the development of childhood aggressive behaviour (Rothbart and Bates 1998). In the study reported here the focus is on the influence of negative reactivity and inhibition on the development of behavioural problems.
