two years in the 1970s. The site shows the number of calls and other objects that have been placed into it, the archaeological record. The person of the person's work that Henry Cole has seen the most that showed the record of his family, and these tended to be from the subject's earlier days.

Henry began his career as a designer in 1949, leaving the Central School without a diploma after six months, having completed just two of the three years of a course in textile design. However, it did not take him long to make a mark. By the time he was twenty-two he had already started his own design studio and a showroom, along with a workshop to make furniture, around the same time.

Henry's first business with his second wife, Shirley, and within five years he had established his work as a design department store in Piccadilly. He started a magazine and printed notices for the Museum, although the latter never knew of his existence.

Henry's rapid accumulation of projects and business was a reflection of his drive energy, a quality that would see him enter the situation of London's Museum. They grew from the chance to exhibit furniture in the Museum's store of the 1960s. In twenty years, he went from exhibiting his work in an artist's studio on Finsbury Street alongside Pauline, Ben Nicholson and Victor Pasmore to becoming the chairman of a £1.8 billion, publicly listed company with one of the world's
