Aims and method The new 2021 UK Foundation Programme Curriculum mandates foundation doctors to acquire mental health competencies. This study aimed to evaluate the effectiveness of psychiatry placements in facilitating competency attainment, foundation doctors' perceived importance of acquiring these and their preferred teaching methods. Utilising Kirkpatrick's evaluation framework, the study employed a pre-post intervention design assessing the impact of psychiatry placements on 135 foundation doctors across three cohorts from August 2021 to March 2022.

Results Initially, foundation doctors assigned high importance to mental health competencies. Post-placements, this perceived importance improved slightly, whereas that of clinical skills scenarios slightly decreased. Significant confidence increases were observed in recognising and assessing specific psychiatric disorders. Foundation doctors favoured small seminar groups and on-the-job ad hoc teaching. Qualitative insights underscored the need for context-specific teaching.

Clinical implications Psychiatry placements enhance foundation doctors' confidence and perceived importance of mental health competencies as specified by the curriculum. Addressing clinical scenario gaps through context-specific teaching and transferable skills development is essential. Customised teaching approaches, especially small seminars and ad hoc teaching, hold promise for effective mental health training.

Keywords Postgraduate medical education; foundation doctors; curriculum; competency; psychiatric placement.

The UK Foundation Programme, established in 2005, is a 2-year postgraduate training programme for newly qualified doctors that provides a comprehensive framework for the development of clinical and professional competency through a series of 4-month-long placements.¹ Historically, foundation doctors were placed predominantly in acute trusts across a wide range of medical and surgical specialties; however, owing to the evolving medical education landscape and recognition of the importance of mental health competencies, the Foundation Programme was broadened to include optional psychiatry placements, with approximately 45% of all foundation doctors being expected to be placed in psychiatry.² Mental health competencies were not made compulsory at that time.

More recently, mental illness has been recognised as one of the top ten leading causes of burden worldwide, with overwhelming pressure on healthcare providers to meet population needs.³ Improving training in psychiatry competencies for healthcare professionals in various settings is necessary to manage the impact of this 'mental health pandemic'. Consequently, Health Education England updated the UK Foundation Programme Curriculum (UKFPC) in 2021,⁴ mandating the acquisition of mental health knowledge and skills under areas of core learning (Box 1).

How do foundation doctors perceive the importance of acquiring psychiatric skills at this training stage, and can participation in psychiatry placements change their perception? Furthermore, to what extent are psychiatry placements equipped to effectively deliver the new curriculum? Is there a preferred way to deliver psychiatric clinical teaching according to foundation doctors' preferences? This study aims to answer these questions by providing insights from the Maudsley Training Programme in South London. To the best of our knowledge, this study is the first to address these questions and specifically evaluate the effectiveness
