Abstract

Home treatment (HT) treats patients in an acute crisis through an interdisciplinary team with daily appointments for a short treatment period. The effectiveness of HT has already been confirmed. However, only few studies addressed specific patient characteristics associated outcome of treatment. This study aimed to identify patient characteristics associated with successful outcomes of HT. A systematic literature search was conducted according to the PRISMA guidelines. A total of 13 studies were included in the systematic review. Being employed, having a regular income, having an anxiety disorder and family involvement were associated with a successful treatment outcome in HT. High symptom severity and former hospital admissions were associated with unsuccessful treatment outcome in HT in the selected studies. HT seems to be especially beneficial for patients with paid employment or regular income, patients with anxiety disorders, and patients with familial or other social support.

Introduction

The treatment concept of providing psychiatric care to patients in their home environment has been known for several decades (Hepp & Stulz, 2017; Hubbeling & Bertram, 2012). However, previous studies and reviews have recognized the lack of a universal definition of home-based psychiatric care (Hepp & Stulz, 2017; Sjölie et al., 2010) and provided an overview of the different approaches of home-based intervention that exist (Hepp & Stulz, 2017). One of these approaches is home treatment (HT), which targets patients in an acute psychiatric crisis who would alternatively be treated in a psychiatric hospital (Gühne et al., 2011). By definition, HT is provided by a mobile and interdisciplinary team consisting of psychiatrists, psychologists, and nurses usually with daily appointments for a short, limited treatment period. To ensure safety at home, some services provide a 24 h emergency phone (Gühne et al., 2011; Hepp & Stulz, 2017). In this study, we focus on treatment based on the aforementioned definition of HT.

Systematic literature reviews and RCTs have supported the effectiveness of HT as an alternative to conventional inpatient treatment, as the implementation of HT reduces the number of admissions to psychiatric hospitals during and after an acute psychiatric crisis (Gühne et al., 2011; Murphy et al., 2015). This was also confirmed in a recent Swiss randomised controlled trial in which over 700 adults in need of acute psychiatric treatment were randomly assigned to receive either conventional inpatient care or HT. Compared to inpatient care, HT was associated with 30% fewer days spent in hospital within two years after the initial crisis (Stulz et al., 2020).

In addition to the reduction in hospital admissions, studies focusing on changes in clinical variables found significant improvements in symptoms and level of functioning (Klug et al., 2010; Mötteli et al., 2018). These results suggest that the overall effectiveness of HT is relatively well
