Gallup combines Roswell Angier's photographs Susan Hawley's watercolor paintings and both of their journal entries as they explore the time they spent in Gallup New Mexico in the late 1970s and early 1980s Gallup is a place where histories and myths meet and Angier and Hawley work through diverse media to portray a place where many versions of Native and American life have flowed together They show that Gallup is both beautiful and difficult to know in a way that reflects the long shadow of Native American disenfranchisement Sober about social realities Angier and Hawley nevertheless find lighthearted humor in the daily life of Gallup They take us from the Navajo creation story to motels from a rodeo to an inherited suitcase of Plains Indian artifacts Through images we travel from Canyon de Chelly to Chaco Canyon from fast food joints to bars Beyond the picturesque clichés offered by the desert full of Airstream trailers and sunsets we find struggles over personal and group identity at one of America's crossroads where a billboard once read Welcome to the Indian Capital of the World
