

Psychiatric Illness in General Practice: The Urgency of the Problem

By L. M. FRANKLIN, M.R.C.S., D.P.H.

No one knows how much psychiatric illness a general practitioner sees, for attempts to measure it have provided inconsistent answers. For instance, a group of eight G.P.s in Sheffield¹ found that in 1947 6.5 per cent of their consultations were for "mental ill health", while another group of G.P.s² in 1953 stated flatly that 60 per cent of a G.P.'s patients present neurotic symptoms. A working party of the College of General Practitioners³ said that 30 per cent was the generally accepted figure for the incidence of psychological illness among people who consult a G.P. but they gave no evidence to support this figure.

The difficulty in measuring the amount of mental illness seen by G.P.s results from the absence of any agreed system of classifying mental illness. There is no agreement as to whether a particular condition should be regarded as psychiatric, and the standards of measurement vary from doctor to doctor. In this situation it is scarcely worth while for any more individual G.P.s to try to measure how much mental illness they deal with. This is a job for a team of professional research workers, and even they will not find it easy.

Nevertheless, most G.P.s feel that it is increasing, and this may well be so. This, of course, is not to say that the total mental illness in the population is necessarily increasing. There is certainly no evidence that the stress of life is now greater than in former times,⁴ and it is probably much less, and it is widely believed that the amount of mental illness depends on the stress of everyday life.

The character of the G.P.'s work has changed considerably in recent years. It has been profoundly modified by two factors, namely, the great advances in medicine and the introduction of the National Health Service. The former have reduced considerably the incidence of many major disorders, but not of mental illnesses, which therefore are relatively higher. This trend has been particularly marked with children's illness, and as a result paediatricians are looking for fresh outlets for their activities. A suggestion has been made⁵ that they should extend their range to include child psychiatry. This proposal has met with acid comments from some psychiatrists, but it has merit in so far as it would help to break down barriers between psychiatry and the rest of medicine.

The National Health Service has almost certainly caused an increase in the amount of psychiatric illness with which a G.P. has to deal. The work of Hollingshead and Redlich⁶ in America suggests why this may be so. They found that there is a marked variation in the incidence and in the severity of mental illness between the social
