

seminar into a more formal postgraduate course in psychiatry called "Psychiatry and the Humanities."

With a junior colleague, Quanesha Young, MD, an early-career psychiatrist and accomplished poet who was completing a master's in philosophy, we created a course to address the complexity of contemporary medicine, illustrated with the biomedical problems of psychiatry contextualized by the humanities. The course debuted in 2016. Alexis Thibault, MD, another early-career psychiatrist with a master's degree in Medical Humanities from King's College of the University of London joined the course in the second cycle.

Medical Humanities

The medical humanities, which are mainly preoccupied with training medical practitioners, highlight the interdisciplinary perspectives of the social sciences, the humanities, and the arts to understand and to deal with biomedical problems. In our course, we apply the medical humanities specifically to psychiatry although the students may apply this perspective to any problem in the field of biomedicine that is part of their research or practice.^{2,5,6,9}

The field of health humanities has a broader mandate, linking health and social care disciplines to the arts and the humanities.

Medical Humanities' Core Values

The values that our course privileges are:²

1. Interdisciplinarity – collaborations and syntheses between medicine and the humanities, allowing these mutually enriching disciplines to address the complexity of human predicaments;
2. Dignity – each contribution to the course should reflect the whole and the dignity of human beings;
