Excerpt from Sea Life in Nelson's Time The keel or backbone of the ship the first wood to be placed in position was laid down upon oak blocks distant some four or five feet from each other The keel was generally of thick elm timbers placed length ways which were scarfed together bolted and clinched at the sides Under this keel and to each side of it in some ships was placed a false keel of elm lightly secured by copper staples This false keel protected the main keel if the ship grounded On this backbone or groundwork the hull Of the ship was built Much of the oak used in the building of the ships was grown in England in the royal forests such as the Forest of Dean in Gloucestershire and the New Forest in Hampshire The oak was very costly for the service required the very best wood It could not be or should not have been used for a year after cutting for it needed to be seasoned before being handled by the Shipwrights On coming to the yards it was stacked for some months in sheds in various positions according to its future use to allow it to season Much of it was pickled or boiled in a kiln for many hours to allow the workmen to bend it to the frame of the ship In times of stress much of it was used green not properly seasoned About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books Find more at www.forgottenbooks.com This book is a reproduction of an important historical work Forgotten Books uses state of the art technology to digitally reconstruct the work preserving the original format whilst repairing imperfections present in the aged copy In rare cases an imperfection in the original such as a blemish or missing page may be replicated in our edition We do however repair the vast majority of imperfections successfully any imperfections that remain are intentionally left to preserve the state of such historical works Sea Life in Nelson's Time - Scholar's Choice Edition John Masefield,2015-02-13 This work has been selected by scholars as being culturally
