

Panzerkampfwagen III Ausf. F/G

Los blindados alemanes, cuando tenían el interior completamente cerrado y al igual que los de otras nacionalidades, iban pintados por dentro de un color claro; el objetivo era reducir la sensación de claustrofobia que pudiera sufrir la tripulación. Este color era Elfenbein RAL 1001 y con él se pintaban las paredes y el techo de la cámara de combate, mientras que el suelo de ésta, la caja de cambios, la transmisión y el compartimento del motor se dejaban en el color de la imprimación antióxido Rot RAL 8012. Por otro lado, todas aquellas partes que resultaban visibles desde el exterior, como la cara interna de las escotillas o las trampillas de acceso al motor o la transmisión, debían estar pintadas del mismo color que el exterior del blindado.

German armored vehicles, when designed to be completely closed, just like similar vehicles of other nationalities, were painted on the inside with a light color. The goal was to reduce the claustrophobic sensation of crews. This color was Elfenbein RAL 1001 and this color was used to paint the roofs and the walls of the combat chamber. The ground however, the gear shift, transmission and motor compartment were usually left with the anti rust priming Rot RAL 8012. On the other hand, all parts visible from the outside, such as the inner side of the hatches, the motor lids or the transmission were painted just like the outside of the armored vehicle.
