Otto Dempwolff's Grammar Of The Jabem La:

Otto Dempwolff's Grammar of the Jabem Language in New Guinea Otto Dempwolff, 2005-01-31 Otto Dempwolff is far better known for his historical and comparative work than for his descriptive and theoretical contributions to linguistics. However the work to which he devoted his last efforts before he died in 1938 was a grammatical description of Jab m an Austronesian language adopted and spread as a church and school lingua franca by the German Lutheran mission in what is now Morobe Province Papua New Guinea. Although Jab m is one of the best documented languages in Melanesia at least in Jab m and German the only materials available in English have been Streicher's 1982 Jab m English Dictionary a brief grammar sketch in Tryon's 1995 Comparative Austronesian Dictionary and sporadic articles on Jab m tonogenesis and verb serialization. This translation of Otto Dempwolff's grammar now adds a comprehensive overview and data rich synthesis of Jab m grammar. Because he wrote his grammar at the request of the Lutheran missionaries Dempwolff took care to make his description understandable to an audience of educated lay people as well as to linguists by explaining his terminology and reasoning as he introduced new topics. This task was made all the more necessary because he considered Jab m to be the most difficult Melanesian language he had ever encountered one for which European grammatical models proved entirely inadequate. The result is a highly original yet surprisingly accessible grammatical description by one of the founders of Austronesian comparative linguistics.
