

HORACE GREGORY

Poems

1930-1940

The new book of poems by Horace Gregory is a selection of the author's best work published between the years 1930-1940. The present book is distinguished by a more single-minded impression: the poems from the earlier books, "Chances Among Men" (1930), "No Road" (1932), and "Chances for Tomorrow" (1935) are selected with the new poems, making the later volume of the book, including the new poems, two high lights.

The background of his generation has used the present time with more opportunity of its experience than Horace Gregory. Almost certainly he gives his opinion of and for the current moment. Yet it is the time to read or what which some critics (particularly right) have called "regret" or other words, properly understood, is born of an acute awareness of the future of the past focused upon the present. Gregory's poems of a retrospective and critical heritage, has produced the feeling of the contemporary more almost as though it were a new. This emotion is not new, nor is it new, but the natural result of a deeper and more carefully considered imagination, bringing in experience as well as the proper recognition of a poet.

As in the first three books, Mr. Gregory's new poems include his dramatic use of the dramatic and lyrical imagination; his "The Wanderer from The House of the Future" and "What John Blue says about the New Year" show an increasing advance over the first volume.
