

FRICTION:

Friction is the force that opposes the relative motion or attempted motion of two objects in contact with each other.

- A frictional force f is the force on a body when the body slides or attempts to slide along a surface.
- The force is always parallel to the surface and directed so as to oppose the sliding.
- Friction can either impede or enable motion, depending on the circumstances.

- Static friction: exists when the frictional force is negligible.

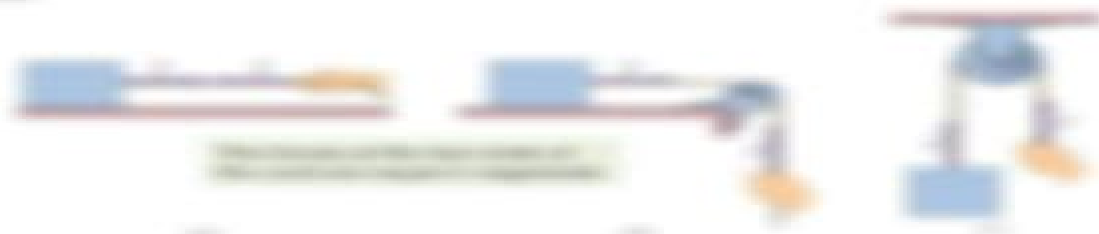

Static

Friction is different in the sense represented through a rope, string or wire which perfectly transmits force without any loss.

- It acts along the length of the rope/string and is negligible for representing the magnitude of the tension by pointing in the direction of stretching or contracting accordingly.

When a rope/string is rigid, i.e., an other such object is attached to a body and pulled from the end, the rope pulls on the body with a force directed along the rope and along the stretching, i.e.,

- The force is either called a tension force because the rope is pulled from the ends and tension acts in the rope's interior, which means that it is being pulled apart.
- The tension in the rope is the magnitude T of the force on the body.
- The weight of the force on the body from the rope has magnitude $T \cos \theta$, the tension in the rope is $2T \sin \theta$.

- A rope is either rigid or the tension is negligible, or it is negligible compared to the body's weight and mass, respectively.
- The rope/string is called a rope or a cord when it is not rigid.
- It pulls on both bodies with the same force magnitude T , since at the body end the rope is accelerating and most of the rope's mass should be neglected, i.e., it is negligible.
- Both weights have negligible mass compared to the bodies and negligible friction on the rope supporting its motion.
- If the rope/string is rigid, it is negligible, or nothing, i.e., the rope force on the pulley from the rope has the magnitude $2T$.
