

Ted Hughes and Geoffrey Hill as Myth Makers

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Myth in the world of literature is perceived and analyzed as archaic superstition. A number of poets referring to various periods of art development, whether Classicism or Romanticism, are considered to be "myth-makers" in a way as they rename the world through making reorder of familiar words and creating new ones. Mythmaking in literature can be analyzed on the examples of famous poets such as Ted Hughes and Geoffrey Hill who managed to embody the mythological elements in their outstanding masterpieces.

For many poets myth is regarded to be an integral part of their personal style and manner of theme presentation; they perform mythological style through symbols, characters, and deep plot – all these factors can be observed in the works by Ted Hughes and Geoffrey Hill.

Ted Hughes

Brief Biography

Edward James Hughes is considered to be an English poet of the XX century who is recognized as one of the best poets of the time. He was born in 1930 and managed to become British Poet Laureate in 1984.

His life was followed by complicated relationships with close people being reflected in some of his works. Ted Hughes is also a well-known children's writer who managed to create a number of interesting and involving stories for kids. His devotion to children's literature is explained by the author's personal childhood experience which "shaped everything" in further life.

Hughes's interest in poetic writings was expressed from an early age; he tried to combine the violence and beauty of the world of nature in order to demonstrate all aspects of human life. (West, 112)
