Knowledge as mental representation
i.e. knowledge is not automatically received either through the senses or by way of communication; its knowledge is actively built up by the learning subject.
In this functional view of knowledge, learning knowledge is or requires.
As a cognitive process, the subject's organization of the experiential world, not the discovery of an objective ontological reality.

Knowledge as constructed concept

Knowledge as a process
The learner is not a passive recipient of knowledge but that knowledge is constructed by the learner in some way.

Education based on complex that modified and improved the individual

The process that occurs between a teacher and student that infuses direct experience with the learning environment and content

Learning is the process of acquiring knowledge through the senses and the mind, which is the result of the student with the intention of helping the student achieve his/her learning goals.

Students obtain knowledge by learning and testing themselves.

New knowledge is acquired by student with previous knowledge

In Piaget's learning, "the students are helped to develop self-learning until before proceeding to a more advanced learning level"

Transfer of learning objectives that establishment for students in three domains: Cognitive, affective, and psychomotor. Learning at the higher levels is dependent on achieving lower levels designed to motivate students to focus on all three domains, creating a more holistic form of education.

Learning is a process of forming associations between stimuli in the environment and the corresponding responses of the individual. Reinforcement strengthens responses and increases the likelihood of another occurrence when the stimulus is present again.

groups of people who share a concern or a passion for something they do and want to do it better as they learn together.

a cultural and specific response that offers a specific theory to explain how interactions lead to learning

Teachers have a central role and transfer their knowledge ability to students.
