

Public Health Collaboration: A Journey from Partnerships to Networked Ecosystems

In the 1990s, building partnerships was declared a core essential function of public health departments. Since then, we've gradually shifted to frame our collaboration as network-building. Today, we've taken another step forward, thinking using an ecosystem lens.

PARTNERSHIP APPROACH: THE 1990s

The partnership-building approach arose from recognizing the importance of collaborating with community groups for better health outcomes. Health departments focused on forming individual relationships, often overlooking the bigger picture and interconnectedness.

This approach enabled connections with community stakeholders, promoting collaboration and resource-sharing. However, its emphasis on individual relationships led to redundancies and misalignments, limiting collaboration impact. Recognizing these limitations, public health professionals adopted systems thinking, leading to the network-building approach.

NETWORK APPROACH: THE 2010s

The network-building approach, based on systems thinking, viewed partners as interconnected entities within a network. Health departments used Social Network Analysis (SNA) to optimize network structures, connect isolated partners, and eliminate redundancies.

While this improved efficiency, resource allocation, and collaboration among partners, it often overlooked informal partners and cross-network connections and created strain from managing and joining multiple networks. Some public health professionals began to adopt an 'ecosystem thinking' approach that was emerging in the tech and business sectors to address similar gaps.

ECOSYSTEM APPROACH: THE PRESENT

The ecosystem-building approach emerged from the tech industry's need to align numerous disconnected actors for technology creation and connection. It focuses on mapping and tracking relationships and interactions over time among all the relevant stakeholders, including formal and informal partners, across various programs and divisions.

This approach fosters holistic understanding, alignment of partnerships, and efficient resource sharing. It enables organizations to identify leverage points and create systemic shifts for improved outcomes. It continues to be refined and adapted to address emerging challenges and optimize its potential.
