

Parenting Styles and Raising Delinquent Children: Responsibility of Parents in Encouraging Violent Behavior

Abstract

It has become increasingly more common for parents of violent youth to blame police for having to respond to the violent behavior of youth with force and at times lethal force. At some point parents should assume responsibility for providing their children with appropriate parenting styles that encourage moral and responsible thinking. Parenting styles have provided us with what appears to be more and what appears to be less effective parenting styles for teaching and encouraging children and teenagers to develop more prosocial attitudes and behaviors. Baumrind's work appears to offer a clear guide to address this issue.

Background

Baumrind and others conducted numerous research studies to identify and evaluate several different parenting styles [1-7]. The focus was on associations made between parental intervention and discipline and later outcome for how the children developed self-esteem, self-control, and overall life functioning. It is important to pay attention to the research literature when guiding or recommending parenting styles. Many people appear to rely on family tradition or make it up as they go as a way to decide how to parent and how to discipline their children. The research is clear when it comes to effective parenting styles: first-physical discipline is the least effective approach and second the relationship between the parent and child is important when implementing effective discipline. Although a child can choose how to behave regardless of what style of parenting the parent chooses to use, research clearly shows what is more effective for positive outcomes. Parenting practices are one of the best predictors of juvenile delinquency.

Two factors have been identified as being important for a child to develop morality (prosocial behavior): parental warmth and demandingness [8-15]. Parental warmth is described as the degree of support offered to a child by the parent. Demandingness is described as the degree of control the parent exerts over their child, (setting standards and expectations of conduct). Sympathy, which appears part of parental warmth and demandingness, appears to have an indirect positive impact on instilling prosocial/moral development in adolescents [16]. Child rearing involving harsh punishment, power-assertive parenting, lax parenting, rejecting or neglectful parenting methods and child abuse are related to antisocial, aggressive and violent behavior in adolescents [17].

Social learning theory also appears to play a role in how the parent operates and how they demonstrate prosocial practices and utilize social rewards [18-21]. Parent-child discussions about moral issues may help instill the same morality in thinking (instilling the parent's beliefs into the child's belief system) and has demonstrated positive effects in teaching prosocial behavior [22,23]. In fact, parent-child conversations concerning prosocial behaviors were significantly associated with adolescents engaging in altruistic prosocial behavior even when doing so had a costly impact on the adolescent [15]. Moral disengagement theory helps offer an explanation of why adolescents may become detached and disengaged from mainstream societal values [24]. If the role models in the home expose children or adolescents to attitudes and beliefs that condone antisocial behavior, the adolescent may become morally disengaged and follow the teachings of the home [25-28]. Harsh treatment and antisocial neighborhood attitudes may help teach the adolescent to disengage from appropriate societal behavior. This is especially true if the early experiences from the home involves parents who are harsh or rejecting caregivers [29,30].

The four types of parenting styles are now discussed [1,2,31].

Authoritative parenting

The parent demonstrates a responsiveness to the child's needs, demandingness (setting expectations of behavior and consequences for noncompliance), monitoring of the child's behavior, providing clear standards of conduct, and discipline based on reasoning rather than based on power assertion or withdrawal of love. Authoritative parents provide home environments rich with strict behavioral supervision with high degrees of emotional support. Within this style of parenting, children are encouraged to behave with prosocial behavior and to reason autonomously about moral problems, to respect adults, and to learn to think independently [32]. Baumrind [32] goes on to comment that the primary two child-rearing goals are to foster moral character and optimal competence. She also adds
