Abstract: While there is growing recognition that transmission of HIV is an ongoing public health concern, little is known about the prevalence of HIV among injection drug users (IDUs) in the United States. This study examined the prevalence of HIV among IDUs in the United States, and the association between HIV prevalence and demographic and risk factors. Data were obtained from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health, a nationally representative sample of adolescents and young adults. The prevalence of HIV among IDUs was 11.5%. HIV prevalence was significantly higher among IDUs who were male, had a history of injection drug use, and had a history of sexual intercourse. The findings suggest that IDUs are at a high risk of HIV infection, and that the prevalence of HIV among IDUs is increasing. The findings also suggest that the risk of HIV infection is higher among IDUs who are male, have a history of injection drug use, and have a history of sexual intercourse.
