

Hedges et al. therefore applied a statistical technique called "meta-analysis" to the same studies that Hanushek examined. Meta-analysis is designed to combine statistical significance values from different studies that test the same hypothesis, thus testing the combined statistical significance of the relationship between school inputs and educational outcomes across studies (rather than counting each study separately). Hedges et al. concluded from their summary that the relationship between resources and student achievement is significant and generally large.

The debate among the synthesizers over what the literature says about whether money and schools matter has not yet been won by either side. Ongoing exchanges continue between Hanushek and the Hedges team; see, for example, Hanushek (1994) and Hedges et al. (1994b). Serious shortcomings in many studies of school productivity give both sides ammunition to question the conclusions drawn by the other about the meaning and significance of the results.<sup>1</sup> A recent Brookings Institution effort to answer the question "Does money matter?" (Burtless, 1996) reflected the range of scientific disagreement on the influence of school spending without resolving the differences that have emerged from over 30 years of research on the subject.

Meanwhile, scholars continue to undertake new studies using improved datasets and statistical approaches designed to overcome methodological criticisms of prior input-output research. Many of these studies are reporting positive findings about the relationship between school resources and student academic performance. Our sense is that the deep skepticism of the first 25 years after the Coleman report has given way in the academic community to a more cautious optimism that some regularities in the relationship may be identifiable through input-output research. Nevertheless, caution remains the operative word, since positive findings that schools make a difference (assuming that they hold up in repeated studies) may not easily translate into specific policies for improving the connection between resource use and results.

This dilemma can be seen in considering the implications of recent research suggesting that factors relating to teachers (especially teacher quality and class size) are significant in explaining differences in student academic achievement.

A much-cited study by Ferguson (1991) dealt with one major criticism of

<sup>1</sup>Ferguson and Ladd (1996:265) point out that neither the Hanushek nor the Hedges et al. literature surveys attempted to distinguish between methodologically sound versus weak studies. Studies using the production function approach to studying educational productivity have frequently been criticized on one or more methodological grounds. Misspecification of production function models (i.e., omitting important variables, using inadequate proxies for variables that cannot be directly measured, or using cross-sectional data when longitudinal analysis might be more relevant) and the use of aggregated data (i.e., data on school districts) rather than disaggregated data (i.e., data on schools or students) are some of the reasons why the findings of input-output studies have been questioned.
