of empirical studies that have used the FAST to provide a comprehensive overview and assessment of the test and its use in various clinical research contexts The book is divided into four sections each focusing on a different aspect of the FAST Part 1 describes the concepts and psychometric properties of the FAST within the context of theoretically and empirically relevant aspects of the field of family psychology as a whole Special emphasis is given to systematic structural approaches to assessing individual and family functioning Part II focuses on the use of the FAST in developmental research For example the the FAST has been used to show how family constructs are influenced by age type of family and situation Part III deals with cross cultural issues and compares the interpersonal constructs of Japanese and Chinese families to Western families Finally Part IV addresses the applications of the FAST in clinical setting in diagnosis of biopsychosocial problems and planning and evaluation of clinical interventions The result is a book that helps to bridge the gap between theory practice and research It will be essential reading for users of the FAST and all clinicians and researchers who work in family relations and development
