

VERITATIS SPLENDOR: SOME EDITORIAL REFLECTIONS

Linda Woodhead

When I was a student I used to visit a lonely old man on Sunday afternoons. Being rather shy and reticent, he used to find it hard to speak to me directly about any matter which concerned him deeply. Fortunately, however, he was able to overcome this difficulty with the unwitting aid of his small dog Ivy. Rather than speak to me about personal matters, he would tell Ivy how he was feeling, intending of course that I should overhear.

I was reminded of this rather roundabout form of communication when I read Veritatis Splendor. Although addressed to the Pope's 'Venerable Brothers in the Episcopate', the Encyclical seems anxious that moral theologians should overhear the conversation. Indeed in many ways it makes much more sense when understood as a communication to the moral theologians rather than to the Bishops. Judging by the public responses to the Encyclical, moral theologians have understood it in this way too.

The publication of Veritatis Splendor in October 1993 has called forth a large number of responses from moral theologians¹ on both sides of the Atlantic. As someone who has tried to read as many of these as possible, not least those submitted for this issue of Studies in Christian Ethics, what has struck me most forcibly has been the divergence of opinion about the Encyclical. No question of being lukewarm here: unlike the Laodiceans, respondents to Veritatis Splendor tend to be either very warm or decidedly frosty.

What may almost be described as a polarisation of opinion amongst Christian ethicists with regard to the Encyclical would not be so surprising if it merely reflected a wider disagreement within the discipline of Christian ethics itself. But in fact divergent responses to
