RELATING EVENTS IN NARRATIVE: A CROSSLINGUISTIC DEVELOPMENTAL STUDY. Ruth A. Berman and Dan I. Slobin (Eds.). Hillsdale, NJ: Erlbaum, 1994. Pp. xiv + 748. $99.95 cloth.

To investigate whether different languages provide different means to relate experiences, the study reported in the present volume had speakers of five different languages (English, German, Spanish, Hebrew, and Turkish) tell a story on the basis of an ordered set of 24 pictures, entitled Frog, Where Are You? In each language, 3-, 5-, and 9-year-old children and adults were included as subjects, as well as a group of 4-year-old English, Spanish, and Hebrew speakers. By making a comparison among these age groups, the differences in how children acquire narrative competence in different languages was examined.

Comprehensive in its own right, this study forms part of a larger crosslinguistic comparison, in which a total of more than 80 projects is being carried out across the globe, involving native speakers of some 42 languages and a variety of bilingual populations as well as subjects with language impairments. Each of these studies uses Frog, Where Are You? as task input.

The specific objectives of this study are to chart the development of linguistic form in children's language. Examples of the linguistic forms considered here are tense and aspect, voice (active/passive), and syntactic constructions such as relative and complement clauses. Moreover, the authors assess how these forms are used for certain narrative functions such as the temporal ordering of events, narrative perspective, and hierarchical organization of the text into main and subordinate components.

The study of how form and function interact in a language is of interest because it may reveal a dependence of the thoughts we express, the information we exchange, and the possibilities and constraints provided by the language we use. The authors of this volume invoke the Sapir-Whorf hypothesis to discuss the implications of their work: Is our thinking shaped or determined by linguistic features and, if so, do members of different language communities therefore think differently? The authors rightfully choose to consider a more modest proposal: The thoughts that constitute speaking in a language may be particular to the linguistic features of that language. As far as the construction of narratives is concerned, our attention may be therefore channeled toward those semantic distinctions that happen to be grammatically marked. For instance, English and German possess a wide variety of means to describe movement, whereas Hebrew, Spanish, and Turkish have a more constrained set of forms available. Does this result in more "dynamic" narratives in the former group of languages? From the adult narratives considered in this study, it appears, as other scholars have also suggested, that language users are inventive, circumventing the constraints imposed by their native language.

This study also reveals that children seem to be reluctant to acquire linguistic forms that are relatively complex in their language. Because there are few ways to construct relative clauses in Hebrew and Spanish, for instance, the younger speakers of those languages use relative clauses more frequently than their peers from the other three language communities, who need
