

Retreat from Protectionism: R. B. Bennett and the Movement to Freer Trade in Canada, 1930–1935

Both the United States and Canada enacted sharp increases in tariffs in 1930 as the Great Depression was beginning. The failure of high tariffs to lead to economic recovery in the following years helped to undermine political support for protectionism. Although the conversion to free trade in the United States during the 1930s has been studied, the similar movement in Canada has been relatively neglected.¹ McDonald et al. find that R. B. Bennett's surprising victory in 1930 was due to Canadian voters' resentment over the Smoot-Hawley Tariff.² As promised during his campaign, Bennett quickly enacted tariff increases on U.S. goods and took steps to make Canada independent of the United States and to strengthen its ties to the United Kingdom. Beginning with Bennett's election, we chronicle his deliberations during the period 1930–35 as he reformulated his views about the appropriate role of the tariff as a policy tool. We find that Bennett's dramatic about-face on trade policy was largely driven by forces beyond his control: the establishment of a "new order," brought about by changes in the trade policies of Canada's two major trading partners, the United States and Britain, very much restricted Bennett's policy choices.

We would like to thank the Government of Canada for financial assistance and the staff of the National Archives of Canada for their help. We also benefited from the comments of Bill Hutchinson, Peter Waite, and several anonymous referees on earlier drafts.
