

Leisure Counseling: The Practice

Patsy B. Edwards

The practice of leisure counseling is ever varied and ever the same. It is varied because it deals with human beings; it is the same because similar kinds of information are required from each person, and that information goes through a similar program to obtain a result. Leisure counseling is a process that occurs when a trained counselor helps one person or a group of persons of any age to determine their present leisure interests, attitudes, and needs and then assists them in choosing the following offwork pursuits that are practical, satisfying, available, and unharmed. The goal of all leisure counselors is to improve the quality of the counselee's life through the optimum use of leisure.

In this article, the work of a private leisure and career guidance center that specializes in leisure counseling will be used as an example of the practice of leisure counseling. This center serves the general public and has been in existence since 1968. Case histories of three recent clients will be presented to illustrate career and leisure counseling services that may be performed for individuals. A brief history of this new profession will precede information on its practice, and a discussion of synthesizing career and leisure counseling will follow.
