It is scarcely more than a century since criminals were treated with the greatest cruelty. Torture was frequently used to extort confessions and many of the penalties inflicted were most brutal. But the eighteenth century philosophers inspired by a humanitarian feeling protested against these abuses as they did against every form of inhumanity. This protest combined with other forces resulted in the abolition of torture in most civilized countries and in making punishment much more humane. The power of judges which had been very arbitrary was greatly restricted and penalties are now inflicted only under the sanction of the penal code. The work of the nineteenth century along these lines therefore has been to render the treatment of the criminal humane and to subject it to a strict regime of law. In the latter part of the nineteenth century a new science of criminology has been developed. This science is divided into two branches criminal anthropology and criminal sociology. His work like that of his contemporary Jürgen Habermas brings into relief the relevance of these German discussions to their counterparts in English language circles. In this book originally published in Germany in 1990 and expanded since Hoffe proposes an extended and original interpretation of Kant philosophy of law and social morality Hoffe articulates his reading of Kant in the context of an account of modernity as a polyphonous project in which the dominant themes of pluralism and empiricism are countered by the theme of categorically binding moral principles such as human rights Paying equal attention to the nuances of Kant's texts and the character of the philosophical issues in their own right Hoffe ends up with a Kantianism that requires rather than precludes a moral anthropology and that questions the fashionable juxtaposition of Kant and Aristotle as exemplars of incompatible approaches to ethical and political thought
