

The Space Within

The assignment is to make a cylinder, somewhat taller than it is wide that suggests the greatest possible internal empty space for the given amount of clay. It is the suggestion of space we are concerned with, not the measurable space. The goal is to create an internal space that feels greater space for most. Right modulations of the surface are possible, as are variations in treatment of the bottom and the edges of the wall of the pot. Do not think of this as a composition and do avoid bulky rim shapes. If you are doing this assignment for a group, you should all use the same amount of clay.

Each time I've done this exercise with students at the beginning of a workshop, the result has been striking: few suggestions. As the week does its work in the cylinders, when I judge your names and rim your mind of this and that. This is both upon personal history and emotional associations, and it is important to stress us to even observation. When the discussion is over, you will not have a single opinion that says a particular shape equals the suggestion of maximum internal space but, instead, a whole lot of the small components of a cylinder and how they succeed in speak of the space within.

Putting these progressions into words is tricky. I have often noticed a weakness in one of the components of a pot only to realize that it would not be a weakness if another component were changed. The troubling perception is that something is not quite right, but the angle of vision itself does contain only a partial truth if it does not discuss the myriad of actions of all the parts. For the purposes of the book I have printed single visual relationships that break the act of making into manageable chunks of structure. They will encourage to think upon the changes of volume using descriptions and appropriate visual examples and find differences to accept them as tools before they fail.

The more obvious visual component of a cylinder is the shape. By shape I mean the profile of the object, its silhouette through a complete section to space. The direction that the cylinder be taller than it is wide has already partially determined the upper of its shape called progression, that is, the relationship of height to width. It would be difficult to compare the internal volume of shapes with subtle differences progression. Figures 1-4 depict a typical set of shapes made for this assignment.
