

Pinch It

1 Pinch the main body mass using the composite technique (page 14)—visualize a pellet shape rather than a ball. Once the two halves are joined, check that the shape is not too full through the center. Scrape and flatten as necessary, but don't over-finish the surface; this refinement will be carried out later.

2 Pinch a pot for the top hump (A.1). As it takes shape, keep checking its size against the main form, aiming to get the proportion that you sketched in your drawing. Don't compromise! When it's the same firmness as the main body, sit the hump on top of the main body and draw a line around the edge. Cut out all the clay that's inside the line.

3 Now that the form is open, you have the opportunity to clean up the join seam on the inside, and if necessary, swell out the shape from inside (B.1).

4 Join the two shapes, adding a coil to the outside seam if necessary so that the two sections appear as one (C.1).

5 Mark off on the pot the four joining areas, making sure they're evenly spaced. Make four soft balls of clay of similar size and use slip to attach them to the pot. Press them onto the underside. Smoothing and twisting them with wet fingertips helps with the shaping (D.1). Take extra care to view the piece from all sides, checking that the piece is well balanced and level. Dry the feet off as you go so that they don't get crushed.

6 Draw (E) and then cut around an object of desirable size, such as a jar lid, to make a circular opening for the teapot lid (F). Cut neatly, holding the knife at about a 45° angle. The disk you remove can be adapted into the lid.
