Recruiting Hispanic Labor Karen D. Johnson-Webb, 2003 Johnson Webb studies the labor recruitment behind the recent surge in immigration to North Carolina Her qualitative study suggests a strong connection between employer recruitment a tight labor market and the growing Hispanic population Evidence indicates that employers prefer immigrant workers and go to extraordinary lengths to recruit them However historical social economic and political factors have also contributed to the massive influx of Hispanic immigrants to North Carolina The policy implications of this study are notable Policy makers should consider local context when crafting immigration policy welfare reform policy and workforce development policy in order for these to be effective

Social Determinants of Immigrant Selection Yukio Kawano, 2006 Self selection theory predicts that skilled workers move to countries with more unequal labor markets and unskilled workers to countries with more equal ones However this thesis alone fails to consider the structural process of uprooting in the sending countries and the process of group adaptation in the host countries Kawano reveals that imbalanced development in peripheral countries induces emigration of skilled workers and that economic and intellectual resources in the receiving coethnic groups positively affect adaptation while social networks and English fluency negatively affect it Racial discrimination in the U S is also a factor
