Recruiting Youth In The College Market Current Practices And Future Policy Options:

Recruiting Youth in the College Market M. Rebecca Kilburn, Beth J. Asch, 2003 How can military service be made more compatible with college plans instead of being perceived as an alternative to college These essays examine trends in high school seniors intentions to enlist or to attend college and compare civilian and military education programs Youth with interest in the military are likely to see themselves as two year college material so offering a stipend higher pay or other means of offsetting the cost of attending school may be an effective recruiting strategy with this group

Recruiting Youth in the College Market. Current Practices and Future Policy Options, 2003 Military recruiting has become more difficult in recent years For the first time in two decades the services failed to meet their recruiting targets for fiscal year FY 1999 While the unusually strong labor market of the 1990s undoubtedly played some role in recent recruiting difficulties another long term demographic trend is likely to also contribute to recruiting woes the large growth in college attendance in recent years Traditionally the services have targeted the recruitment of those youth who have no immediate plans to attend college However because high quality youth are increasingly likely to choose to attend college right after high school the services may benefit from considering whether they could target this group The services might be able to significantly expand their pool of potential recruits by adopting policies that target youth who plan to go to college or who actually do go to college immediately following high school We call this group youth in the college market
