The cataclysmic space saga continues here:

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 10-week training program on the cardiovascular and metabolic responses to a 10-min, 100% maximal aerobic power (MAP) test. Ten sedentary, healthy, male subjects were recruited and divided into two groups: a control group (CON) and a training group (TRN). The TRN group underwent a 10-week training program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 min. The training program was designed to increase the subjects' aerobic capacity and endurance. The CON group remained sedentary throughout the study. The subjects were tested at baseline and after 10 weeks. The tests included a 10-min, 100% MAP test and a 10-min, 50% MAP test. The results showed that the TRN group had significantly higher values for heart rate, stroke volume, and cardiac output during the 10-min, 100% MAP test compared to the CON group. The TRN group also had significantly higher values for oxygen consumption and energy expenditure during the 10-min, 100% MAP test compared to the CON group. The TRN group also had significantly higher values for heart rate, stroke volume, and cardiac output during the 10-min, 50% MAP test compared to the CON group. The TRN group also had significantly higher values for oxygen consumption and energy expenditure during the 10-min, 50% MAP test compared to the CON group. The results of this study suggest that a 10-week training program can improve the cardiovascular and metabolic responses to a 10-min, 100% MAP test.
