

THE CHRISTIAN WAY IN RACE RELATIONS

BY RACHEL HENDERLITE

MANY Christians are disturbed and uneasy today because in the present racial situation we do not seem to find a clear principle of behavior from our religious faith. Most Christians, indeed most people, have a rather clear sense of right and wrong when it comes to matters of personal behavior. We know that it is wrong to tell an untruth, to beat one's wife, to cheat in business. But when it comes to a highly complicated moral situation in which a whole pattern of culture is involved, a pattern of culture we did not ourselves in the first place inaugurate, the mandate from Christian faith is not so easily discernible. For some indeed the Christian faith is irrelevant to culture patterns. Christianity has to do with personal salvation and that alone. For others there persists an uneasy feeling that Christian principles are at stake, but in the complexity of the problem one principle seems almost to nullify others, and so they hold the whole matter in abeyance. Still others, in their inability to see the whole, choose one principle to the neglect of a great many others, holding on to that one fiercely, citing Biblical references to support their conviction that this behavior represents God's will even though the chosen principle may be and often is only a partial principle and in ultimate opposition to the main tenets of the faith they proclaim.

Whichever of these or other categories we fall in, most of us are uneasily aware that this does not represent the full demand of the Christian faith. These inadequate interpretations of the Christian imperative call to mind the Biblical story of Samson and the pillars of the temple and point to the dangers of a partial response. I am indebted to the late Dr. Lewis J. Sherrill of Union Theological Seminary in New York for the suggestion that the Samson motif throws light on the racial situation in the South today in that Samson was willing to destroy himself in order to destroy the enemy. In both instances there is limited understanding of God, albeit a frenetic zeal.
