A Genetic Epidemiology Study of Dementia in a Migrant Chamorro Cohort Louise Shane Gresham, 1996 The continuing high incidence of dementia among the Chamorro people of Guam and clinical and neuropathologic similarities of this disorder to Alzheimer's and Parkinson's disease is of great public health concern A molecular epidemiology study was conducted to determine prevalence of dementia among a cohort of 75 Chamorro migrants residing in San Diego California in 1992 1995 Risk of disease and genetically mediated differences in susceptibility to environmental neurotoxins that may confer risk of dementia were also examined in this case control study The Chamorro cohort displayed a dramatically higher prevalence of dementia using the Cross Cultural Cognitive Examination CCCE when compared to U S and European estimates The pattern of impairment observed is comparable to Parkinsonism and dementia seen on Guam with 50% of those aged 70 and above showing significant cognitive impairment Subjects with dementia displayed dissociation between odor identification and olfactory threshold scores which is typical of early dementia No CYP2D6 alleles or APOE genotypes previously associated with Parkinson s or Alzheimer s disease were found to be highly represented in the cohort or in the dementia group in particular The data suggest that molecular and cellular processes involved in Guam dementia may be different A DNA specimen bank was created for future molecular based studies Age and education protective were significant predictions of dementia Age and odor identification ability protective were predictions of impairment in visual memory Although not reaching significance there was a consistent pattern of higher risk of dementia in subjects exposed to cycad during ages 18 40 History of smoking was protective against dementia only in the presence of the a CYP2D6 mutation The results of this research show the need to follow the migrant Chamorro population from Guam closely to see if dementia manifested as Parkinsonism dementia or Marianas dementia will disappear as older cohorts die and to maintain surveillance of neurologic disease in the first and second generation Chamorros residing in California Research must continue before the time frame of opportunity vanishes Scientific Directory and Annual Bibliography National Institutes of Health (U.S.),1983
