

DESIGN OF STEEL BRIDGES

Part (I)

ROADWAY STEEL PLATE GIRDER BRIDGES

1. Introduction

Planning and designing of bridges is part art and part compromise, the most significant aspect of structural engineering. It is the manifestation of the creative capability of designers and demonstrates their imagination, innovation and exploration. Bridge design is a complex engineering problem. The design process includes consideration of other important factors, such as choice of bridge system, materials, dimensions, foundations, aesthetics, and local land escape and environment.

Basically, the design process of bridges consists of two major parts: (1) the preliminary design phase and (2) the final design phase. The preliminary design stage consists of a comprehensive search of current practical and analytical applications of old and new project in all its aspect. The final design stage consists of a complete treatment of a new project in all its aspects. This includes any material, steel, or concrete problems. The important argument is that with this approach a significant saving in design effort can be easily achieved particularly in the final stage.

In order to plan and design a bridge, it is necessary first to visualize it. The fundamental creativity lies in the imagination. This is largely reflected by the designer's creativity and the designer's past experience and knowledge. Also, the designer's concept may be based on knowledge gained from comparisons of different bridge schemes. Generally, the designer approaches the problem successively in two steps. In preliminary design, the first and the most important part is the creation of the bridge schemes. The second step is to check schemes and sketch them in a drawing. It will then be possible to determine other design needs. An examination process is then carried out for other design requirements (e.g., local conditions, span systems, construction height, profile, etc.). From an economic point of view, choice of span of structure, configuration, etc. is very essential. From the cost and aesthetics prospective, the view against the local environment is important. Completing these two steps yields the desired bridge scheme that satisfies the project proposal.

In the preliminary design stage it is also required to find a rational scientific analysis scheme for the conceived design. Thus an essential part of preliminary design is to select and refine various schemes in order to select the most appropriate one. This is not an easy task since there are no existing formulas and solutions. It is based mainly on the designer's experience and the requirements dictated by the project.

The final stage requires a detailed study and analysis of structural behavior and stability. Economy and safety are also important aspects in bridge design, but considerable attention must be given to detailed study for the analysis, which involves the final choices of the structural system, materials, dimensions, and many others.
